In an age where technology has changed our understanding of the spaces we inhabit and the relationships we maintain with these and what is contained within them, the presence of the human gesture becomes no more than a trace. The artists in this exhibition explore through different media, how forms in contemporary culture become 'other', creating a plethora of realities that overlap, and are impossible to distinguish from the 'real'. Space becomes a product of representation, which can be used as a social tool, organizing and imposing a schema upon which we orientate ourselves within a multitude of changing landscapes. 'Ideology' is then conceived in terms of a space of representation that the subject inhabits, a limitless space, which the subject negotiates his/her way through. Everyday spaces and the activities we engage in end up creating narratives to an extent predetermined by the contemporary environment itself. Consequently, the authenticity of our experiences, of both the artwork and life beyond the gallery, is put into question. Some works engage in an investigation of the self as a product of habitual patterns, where experience, memory and social structures interweave. Others explore the arising contradictions between machine memory, human memory, collective memory, and the relics – both physical and symbolic – left behind from a different era. Overall all works explore the shifting boundaries between being an enclosure that structures our engagement with the world, and being a threshold into other realities.

Sarah Pager
Thomas Adam

Sarah Pager - Sarah's work uses familiar objects awkwardly or jarringly reframed to offer a tear in the fabric of reality. Often referencing the body, in a society where objects offer redemption by proxy her sculpture is sited in an area where desire touches on obscenity.

Thomas Adam - the central drive of Thomas's practice is a blurring of lines between the established concepts of drawing, the physical and the metaphysical. This exploration attempts to question drawing's most core aspect - as an implement to represent the real and the physical. Mundane imagery and objects are arranged using different methodical systems, in an attempt to bridge the fault line between the real and the surreal, absurdity and necessity.

Julia Vogl - American and British, Julia's work incorporates architecture, colour and public engagement. Inspired by political events, social behavior and the community where the work is sited, she aims to create works that reveal underlying cultural values. She presents two works here: 'Greetings' - following her social sculpture practice, inviting participants to complete the work; 'Metropolis', a continuation of a print/drawing/collage series, that explores aerial perspectives of imagined cities inspired by Modernism/De Stijl and a passion for colour.
